The highest number of Americans in recent years are heading to national parks August 25 in recognition of the National Park Service's 100th anniversary. According to a recent AAA survey, a whopping 85 percent of U.S. adults have visited at least one national park, and 79 percent are as likely or more likely to visit a national park in the next 12 months. Visitation to the national parks reached an all-time high in 2015, with more than 307 million visitors. The demand for national parks is off the charts this year, as the wide variety of national parks offer something for every traveler to discover.

National parks are growing in popularity among younger generations, with nearly half of Millennials (46 percent) citing that they are more likely to visit a national park in the next year, outpacing both Generation X and Baby Boomers. According to the National Park Service, the most visited national parks in 2015 were the Great Smoky Mountains, Grand Canyon and Rocky Mountain.

AAA's survey revealed the three parks that top most Americans' bucket lists for future travels:

- Yellowstone (33 percent)
- Yosemite (17 percent)
- Grand Canyon (12 percent)
